

the case for andrew boe

INTERVIEW
sonja koremans

How do you interview Andrew Boe without asking: "What was it like to defend Australia's most notorious serial killer, Ivan Milat?"

Of course it's probably considered gauche to delve into that distant part of Andrew's career, particularly as no lawyer ever wants to be defined by one case. Besides, the 40-year-old, whom colleagues describe as fearless, has been in the public eye more recently for his defence work in the high-profile Di Fingleton, David Ettridge and Palm Island cases. But these cases are unlikely to ever hold public attention to the extent of the serial killer and his 1996 trial.

Ivan Milat was arrested in 1994 and later convicted of the murders of seven young backpackers between 1989 and 1992.

Andrew, who was 29 at the time of the arrest, was one of a series of lawyers who represented Milat. "It's not surprising that people still ask me about it," he says. "It's human nature to be
